FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

The Hudson Shore Labor School (formerly known as the Bryn Mawr Summer School for Women Workers in Industry) will hold its nineteenth annual session from June 19 to August 4, the first session to be held in the new year-round home of the school at West Park, New York. Here, two hours from New York City, in a delightful rural setting on an old estate overlooking the picturesque and historic Hudson River, 60 women workers will enjoy healthful outdoor living combined with opportunities for study and discussion of problems of labor and industry. Special projects planned for this summer's school include training for recreation and dramatics leadership in unions and similar groups; planning activities for ladies auxiliaries and children's work in unions; analyzing the relation of the worker to the community; and studying the relation of the worker to government with special consideration of social and labor legislation.

Workshop activities will include mimeographing of bulletins and shop papers, making posters, and presenting facts and figures in attractive pictorial form. These special projects and activities are in addition to the regular classes in labor problems and economics, English, science and dramatics.

Workers come to the summer school from all industries employing women, from all parts of the United States and from several foreign countries including Canada, England, Denmark and Sweden. One of the British applicants for this summer's school is a bus conductress and a member of the Transport Workers Union. The school will also be visited this year by a group of French workers who are being sent by their unions to visit industries and workers' education projects in this country.

Complete information about entrance requirements and scholarships will be sent on request from the Summer School Office, 302 East 35th Street, New York City.
